

Dear Friend,

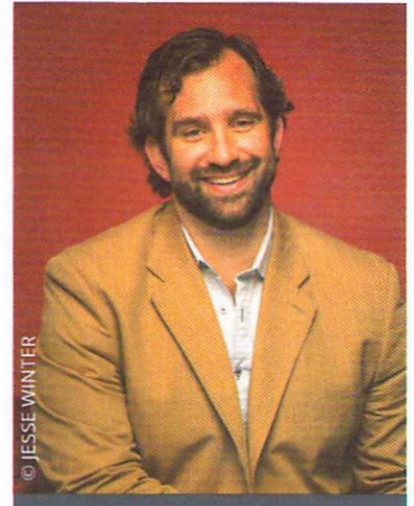

Doctors Without Borders teams are saving lives in some of the toughest parts of the world, where very few groups are operating. We are using every tool and tactic available to us to bring care to people who are in desperate straits.

As you read this, our medical teams are working on the front lines of five of the most acute conflicts our world is facing.

- In Mosul, Iraq, our teams often operate within striking distance of snipers. We have treated over 12,000 patients in our emergency rooms and performed 2,000 surgeries. We have also treated more than 450 severely malnourished children who fled from the fighting.
- In Yemen, where a severe cholera outbreak is raging, Doctors Without Borders has treated over 82,000 patients—20 percent of all reported cholera cases. We also continue to perform trauma surgery on wounded people and to treat malnourished children who have been cut off from access to food.
- In South Sudan, where fighting from the civil war has spread to most of the country, we are conducting our biggest crisis response in the world.
- In northern Nigeria and the Lake Chad area, where people fleeing conflict remain stuck in camps, we're treating outbreaks of measles and meningitis.
- And in northern Syria, we have more and more teams at work, including treating patients at trauma stabilization points right on the front lines.

I am so proud of our teams finding ways to save lives in tough and dangerous circumstances. And we all appreciate your support for this critical work.

But it's our patients—people willing to do everything they can to save their families—whose courage we cannot ignore.

Jason Cone

Executive Director
Doctors Without Borders

Often, by the time we reach them, they've already been through hell and back, and they've had to make unthinkable difficult decisions. On my most recent field trip to our operations in Central America, I met many children, just eight to twelve years old, who were fleeing home alone.

Desperate parents are sending their children on the road alone because they believe their children have a better chance at safety and survival than if they were forcibly conscripted into one of the brutal gangs in El Salvador or Honduras.

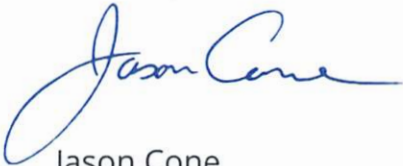

For so many of these children and others in need of lifesaving medical care, if Doctors Without Borders were not there, they would have nowhere else to go. We are the difference between life and death, and that leaves little room for failure.

By helping carry forward our work, you are showing our patients that you're there for them too. When people face life-threatening medical emergencies, you are committed to taking action, to reaching out with a helping hand.

I've enclosed some material showing the impact that you and other Doctors Without Borders supporters are having on people's lives. Please take a moment to review it, and thanks again for your compassion and generosity.

We deeply appreciate all you do to sustain our work.

Sincerely,

Jason Cone

"I believe in Doctors Without Borders, and I'm a donor myself. I see how responsible we are with our money. And the fact that we're free to choose what we do with our money because it comes from donors, not from governments, is amazing. We don't have to be told where to go; we go where people need us."
